

SEATTLE'S COMPREHENSIVE PLAN 10-YEAR UPDATE

You're Invited...

The City of Seattle's Department of Planning and Development (DPD) and the Planning Commission invite you to a series of four public meetings in April and May to review and comment on the proposed amendments to Seattle's Comprehensive Plan.

DPD has published a draft set of recommended amendments to the City's Comprehensive Plan. This year marks the 10th anniversary since the City first adopted the Plan and its urban village strategy.

State law requires that the City update its Plan by the end of 2004, and the City has decided to go beyond the state's requirements to propose changes to make the Plan clearer and to make it work better with regulations and with transportation improvements.

"It's important we hear from citizens about the direction we're heading as a city," said Mayor Greg Nickels. "The Comprehensive Plan is our strategy for building strong and healthy communities in Seattle."

With this update, the Plan will help the City to accommodate about 50,000 new households and about 90,000 new jobs by the year 2024. The majority of those residents and jobs will go to the urban centers and urban villages that the original Plan identified.
